Deb,

That must have been quite a sight. I still haven't got a good look at ONE of them.

I am going to aunt Janice's memorial service on Thursday, then to the Detroit Auto Show on Friday (with my next door neighbor and some of his friends), then I've got Monday off for Martin Luther King's birthday. Carol has to work. Carol wants to get the equipment and training to do biofeedback. She just ended her therapy, and in the last several months of it, she was getting biofeedback. She thinks she would enjoy doing it and could make money. The training and equipment is expensive, so she'd better.

My friend Alan has figured out how to show digital pictures on a DVD player. I don't know much about DVD players, but apparently you can play CDs on them also. Alan found some software for $30 that allows you to create digital picture albums that can be written to a CD and then played on a DVD player. But he also found that the CDs he created would not play on just any DVD player. He tried several before he found one that would.

Alan has not yet scanned the pictures you sent me, but he plans on doing it soon. I'll send them when he does. He has also done a high-resolution scan of the negative of my picture of the old dead tree hanging over the edge of the Sleeping Bear Dune. He is touching it up, using Adobe Photoshop to remove dust specs, etc. Then we are going to see how large a print we can make and still maintain the sharpness.
